representative of the minstrel organization of which Field is manager.

Little did he know at that time that some day he would be a Friar, ever under the watchful, hard-boiled eye of Abbot Wells Hawks.

Later he represented Henry W. Savage ahead of "The Prince of Pilsen" company, and still later arranged riots for Thomas Dixon, Jr., as advance agent of "The Clansman."

And later yet, while out of a job, he wrote "The Undertow," which was not a big success.

Then came the Valley Forge of his career. He was not able to get a job and more than once he went supperless to a bed in Bryant park.

But he did not lose his nerve, and it was during this season of depression that he wrote a play which, if present patronage is any criterion, will run Indefinitely. It is one of the big successes of the season, and it pays him more in royalties every month that he ever earned in five years before in his life. As a steady, unfalling source of revenue he never had anything to equal it, except that Pocatello stud poker game, which was too good to last. But this will last. The author of a successful play, unless he surrender his copyright, must perforce make money in spite of himself.

It has been said of this man that he will be to the stage what Jack London is to the narrative form of literature. His human animal characters are well and powerfully portrayed.

And like London, he has been a tramp, and is not ashamed to own it.
